Will NQFs bring Asia and Europe closer together, increase education and/or work mobility, and support conversion of systems?

Metaphor: NQ as a currency ($)

- Every country already has quality assurance systems, but may be still fragmented and less transparent; thus difficult to get “conversion rate”.
- The existing currency may still be fragmented, i.e. Timor Leste below one dollar using local currency above 1$ using US$. (MoE vs. MoL)
- By having NQF, we can have a reference that can also be used for conversion.
- How serious are we in LLL and labor mobility? (Dr Brigit Thomann, BIBB)
Labor mobility in SEA

- ASEAN Free Trade Area (AFTA) will be fully implemented in 2015
- ASEAN + 3 (Japan, South Korea, China)
- ASEAN + 6 (+ India, New Zealand, Australia)

- Having common “currency” may be helpful
- All welcomes for education mobility but some are still cautious with open labour mobility.
Statistics on Labour Mobility in SEA

• In 2005, about 13.5 million of the world’s 200 million international migrants originated from ASEAN countries (Laipson & Pandya, 2010)
• 5.6 million estimated migrated within the region, constituting 10 percent of its total population.
• Singapore, Malaysia, and Thailand received the most migrant workers.
• ASEAN members received US$32.7 billion in remittances

Broken promises?

- Depending on how serious we are in LLL and labour mobility
- Don’t pretend
- Balance between policy and implementation
- Prof. Naffe: NQF addresses more on education than employment.
- It’s still a new currency. It takes sometime.
THANK YOU!
